I was half enjoying cutting rocks up with a laser, then my progress was halted by an insurmountable, game-breaking design flaw. There is no way to upgrade your robot to be able to mine radiated caverns without GOING BELOW THOSE CAVERNS.

So yeah, don't buy this.

Also, the dev changed names to distance themselves from their other games but left the bundle of those games on their store? I don't get it either.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7_rVPXP4wzg. As Mr. Jacobs said before me, after only 20 ish levels you're unable to proceed because you're missing a mineral you need for a radiation resistance upgrade, which you need earlier than you can get said mineral.

I really liked the idea of the game when I saw it a good week ago, so I bought this upon release and tried it today.

The game is cute and feels okay to play, but there are just so many flaws and pointless mechanics that make it not worth playing.

- For starters, it's poorly translated from whatever language \(or the dev just really knows that little English\).

- When mining a cube, pieces break off of it with momentum, sometimes towards your robot which then hurt it - with no obvious mechanism to avoid this.

- Upgrades have no description so you just have to guess what it does.

- A very limited "mission inventory" of 2 different minerals per level \(with the option to upgrade later on, where you can't get to because read first line of the review\), although there are far more minerals in each cube.

- A seemingly pointless mechanism to pick each chunk of minerals up with a mouse click, even when you "decided" on two minerals that you want to mine.

Overall it seems to me the dev did not put any effort into optimizing this game at all, it feels roughly put together and released in hopes of making easy money off its customers.

If they work on these obvious and probably easy to fix problems, this game might be worth its price.

For now, don't buy.
