Trump's election and ensuing policy decisions reflect a shift within the US to align with Russia over its aggressive influence campaigns since the fall of the Berlin Wall, and a shift within the Kremlin as to what it views as a US administration with divergent policy principles that could further escalate the country's regional isolation .. In one of the most significant developments of the case, US intelligence officials said Wednesday that they have identified "potentially significant indicators" of possible Russian involvement in hacking aimed at the U.S. election.

A senior Senate Democrat said Wednesday that President-elect Donald Trump himself has drawn support from Russia for the election campaign, even if he will not be president until January 20, but he expressed confidence that Moscow will hold up its end of the deal. "The election didn't come up yesterday," Senator Al Franken of Minnesota said. "What that's all going to show us is will President Putin and Vladimir Putin be willing to compromise on how to advance bilateral and global security? And if not, will Mr. Trump be up for it?".. "These indications strongly suggest that the Russian Government directed the recent compromises of e-mails from U.S. persons and institutions, including from U.S. political organizations, and that the Russian Government developed such capabilities prior to November 8, 2016," intelligence agencies said in a declassified statement distributed to CNN and other news outlets.
